

Low Power FM expansion could eliminate the major national Christian radio network K-LOVE from our area, since it broadcasts on an "FM Translator" in many areas. This is the only contemporary Christian music station that can be heard in this area. The K-LOVE signals are paid for by donations to the station, and not by advertising.

Regulatory changes that force these stations off the air would harm the community by removing the availability of this religious programming from a bible-belt community.

This station provides many families, including mine, with family friendly programming that would be difficult to replace. This programming surely is an asset to the communities where it is available, as proven by the continued donations by listeners to keep it running. How many other content providers are important enough to a community that people would donate as much as $40 or more to keep it available?
